

Gift of Work

When closing my closet, the door wouldn't shut all the way, so I would just leave it there or try pushing the clothes in. My parents always told me to refold all the clothes and that would fix the problem. So when I told my parents that I was getting this project, we all knew what I should do it on. During the process, I took out all the clothes, separated the ones I didn't want, then hanged or folded it back into piles. After I did it, my closet was neater and organized by color and design. I was proud that I accomplished the closet project and fixed the problem of not closing my closet door all the way.

I learned from doing the project that it takes time to work through each step to get it done. Taking about 4 hours to finish it made me realize that if I took longer breaks and procrastinated that would have made the job longer. In addition, I had to learn from not dragging through it and putting it in my responsibility list. Whenever there is a problem with something, fix it right away. If I never get it done, I might forget and then the closet would get even messier. The consequence could be the door stuck and unaligned.

My project related to Jason's because in order to clean a closet it takes a long time to thoroughly fold, hang and put back every single piece of clothing. Jason took a long time to put those fences up and an even longer time when Gus took them down in the beginning. At the end, he started caring about if the fences are being placed neatly. I also didn't care before I did my project. I would just leave the closet door not closing all the way. At the end, I realized it's good to take care of my own things. In addition, after Gus took down those fences, Jason worked harder and would go out everyday to take the job done on his own. In comparison, I also learned to become more independent without anyone telling to finish or do the job. In the future, being independent will help me with a different aspect of life.
